Dream Journal

"Will she die soon?" Sixteen-year-old Livy Moore has finally summoned the courage to ask about her mother's illness. But she already knows the answer: for two years, Livy has watched her mother grow smaller and weaker. Now, in a series of journal entries, Livy chronicles the summer before her junior year--the summer she watches her mother slip away from her, as she succumbs to breast cancer. Livy has survived the pain of losing her mother by shutting herself off from the rest of the world. She has alienated herself from her best friend, and her and her father live as strangers in the same house, barely speaking, and never allowing themselves to share the grief that is tearing each of them apart. But when Livy gets swept up in a strong but ill-fated crush, and her mother's condition worsens, she must learn to trust not only those around her, but herself. A beautifully written coming-of-age novel, Dream Journal gazes unflinchingly at the pain of loss and the beauty in survival.

Train your brain to remember your dreams! Nice colored design for you to enjoy the activity of finding out more about the unconscious part of your brain. We forget our dreams as we open our eyes in the morning. By writing them down, you are teaching your brain to remember these dreams of yours. Why would you do that though? Here is why: our dreams are a secret door to our subconscious, therefore writing them down will help you identify the recurrent ones or recurrent themes.
