Delta's Key to the TOEFL IBT

This study aims to describe the strategies used by Taiwanese students with coaching-school training when attempting a set of TOEFL reading comprehension items and to investigate their perceptions of the training they received. Data were collected from 43 students at a coaching school in Taiwan while they did three tasks: (1) thinking-aloud while attempting a set of TOEFL reading comprehension items; (2) writing down what they recalled of the passage; and (3) answering interview questions regarding their preparation for the test and their perceptions of the training received. The think-aloud data were transcribed and coded to build a taxonomy of strategies. The participants were categorized into three groups according to their scores on the set of items and then compared in their (1) performance on the recall task, (2) use of strategies, and (3) perceptions of the coaching-school training. This study concludes with two recommendations to reading instructors in preparing Taiwanese students for reading tests: (1) focus instruction on comprehension and metacognitive strategies, and (2) teach general test-taking strategies and encourage the use of other strategies only as an aid to more general comprehension strategies.--Abstract
